Family, friends mourn loss of Poly students

Air accident victims often flew together

By Sharon Sherman
Staff Writer

Two Cal Poly students who "lived their lives to the fullest" are being remembered by friends and family after they died in a plane crash Friday night.

Thomas Laughlin, 24, a Delta Tau fraternity member, and John Arbuckle, 21, a member of Alpha Gamma Rho, were killed when their plane crashed into a hillside near Port San Luis Obispo.

Kendy Hooper, a Cal Poly student and friend of both victims, said, "They're both two of the finest individuals, they really truly are."

"Everybody constantly comments about how both of them really lived their lives to the fullest."

Laughlin was piloting the two-seater plane when the crash occurred. He had obtained his pilot's license about 1 1/2 years ago and was an avid flyer, according to friends.

Frank Leonard, Delta Tau president, said, "Anytime you wanted to go home, guys who live in Sacramento, Los Angeles or Monterey, he would always say, 'Hey, I'll fly you there.' Any excuse to get up in the air."

The single-engine Cessna was owned by Cal Coast Flyers of San Luis Obispo. As a member, Laughlin was able to take a

Prop. 103 affects local insurers

Full impact of court's decision remains undetermined

By Marni Katz
Staff Writer

The effects of the state Supreme Court decision to uphold the insurance rate-cutting, Proposition 103, are already being felt in San Luis Obispo, but many local insurance companies suggest it will be a while before the full effect of the decision will be known.

Last Thursday the predominantly conservative Supreme Court surprised insurers by ruling that Proposition 103, passed by popular vote in California last November, was constitutional, and did not, as insurers had claimed, violate their constitutional property rights.

According to The Associated Press, Harvey Rosenfield, the chief author of Proposition 103, said the court's ruling is "a major unprecedented victory for citizens, consumers and

Some of the provisions of the initiative include a restriction on rate-setting by territory, a 20 percent discount for drivers who have had no more than one moving violation in the past three years, and the requirement for insurance companies to first get approval from the insurance commissioner before raising rates. However, one major provision of the bill was not completely upheld by the court — that was a 20 percent rebate and one-year rate freeze on current policies. The court decided that some insurers may be exempt from this provision if they could prove that it would cause "a substantial threat of insolvency," or make it difficult for the company to stay in business.

A spokesman for Aaron Corob Insurance in San Luis Obispo said this discrepancy will make it impossible to know for a while exactly what effects the new initiative will have on the insurance industry. He said it "depends upon how insurance companies react to the Supreme Court decision."

"It's going to take a little while for insurance companies to digest the decision," he said. But as of now, he said, his company is not expecting any change in rates or availability of insurance.

Dick Jordison of Allstate Insurance, California's largest automobile and homeowners' insurance company, read from an official statement from Allstate's national office, and declined to offer specifics about the effects of the initiative in San Luis Obispo. He said that predicting any effects now would be speculation.

However, Jordison did say that no change in rates are predicted, and Allstate is not planning on "dropping out of California."

It was predicted when the initiative first passed that many insurance companies would discontinue their coverage for Californians.

Jackie Coon, manager of Alliance Insurance Service in San Luis Obispo County, had a different story. She said many of the insurance companies who are immediately feeling the effects of the initiative are the smaller companies. "Some of the larger companies haven't been as affected," she said. Alliance Insurance Service is a general brokerage agency that commissions policies to different insurance companies.

Coon said prior to the bill's passage, AIS had five national and local insurance companies. When the bill passed in November, she said, two of its national companies decided to move out of California and discontinue coverage, and one local company relocated to Oregon.

NTSB finds no equipment failure in plane disaster

By Sharon Sherman
Staff Writer

The on-site investigation of a plane crash that left two Cal Poly students dead has shown there to be "no pre-existing mechanical malfunctions or failures," an investigator for the National Transportation Safety Board said Tuesday.

Thomas Laughlin, 24, and John Arbuckle, 21, were both killed in the crash Friday. Both were agricultural management majors and were close to graduating.

Don Llorente, investigator from the NTSB's field office in Los Angeles, said the on-scene investigation is complete, but the overall investigation will continue until a cause of the crash is determined, a process that may take as long as eight months.

The accident occurred May 5 at 9:20 p.m. in the hilly area near Port San Luis Obispo, about eight miles southwest of San Luis Obispo Airport. Llorente said the plane hit the hillside about 100 feet above sea level.

Reports that a harbor patrol officer heard the engine stall prior to the crash were misinterpreted, Llorente said. The officer heard the motor of the single-engine Cessna 152 at full throttle, and then heard it "cut off."

Llorente said the engine stopped abruptly when the plane hit the hillside, not prior to the crash. Reports from another witness confirmed this, Llorente said.

Confessions of an addict

By Stewart McKenzie

Hello. My name is Stewart M. I'm a drug addict. I never thought I could possibly get addicted. I always "just said no" and avoided the pleadings of my friends.

"NO!" I'd say. "That stuff's for losers. Let's go do something more interesting, like having a riot at Cedar Creek." My friends, of course, were always up for a riot over taking drugs, so temporarily I could avoid the peer pressure.

But finally, I gave in. I let my defenses down and decided to try it. Then I wanted more. And more. Within the space of months, I have progressed from ingesting a few sniglets of the controlled substance to a crazed, primitive craving for the magic tonic. Now, whenever I need to go from a tired, worn out soul to a person full of vim and vigor, I can do it instantly. It's easy.

All was well for a while, as it "picked me up while it soothed me down." I was always up-and-at-'em, ready to bleed over my notebook in the name of good grades. My sleep patterns went from seven hours a night to two, giving me a chance to work on my transmission after hours. I started bench-pressing close to 400 pounds. I took up paving highways as a hobby. And all my roommates could do was to scratch their heads, seeing I had actually done my dishes. Truly an accomplishment.

But Camelot didn't last forever. I'd wake up jittery and strung out in the morning. People would call and I would scream at them for a few hours to wake up. I couldn't sleep when I tried, and invariably I'd take my frustrations out on neighborhood animals. In the last month, I have mauled 29 cats, 14 dogs and a Williams Bros. employee. On behalf of the Humane Society, I apologize.

Soon I'd regressed to the form of an amoeba. No longer did I enjoy drinking watered-down Coke from quaint, environmentally hazardous styrofoam cups at the Snack Bar. My hair started falling out in clumps. My throat was dry, except when I was dry heaving. I had the shakes. People stopped talking to me, except to borrow money. I was fat, smelly and generally out of it.

However, I'm safe from the law. I can abuse this drug to my dying days and the DEA could care less. I can ingest it over a meal in a public place (though freebasing it would be a tall order.) I can even run for county supervisor and not worry about getting recalled on this issue.

Hello, world. Meet one of the new coffee achievers — me.

Reporter's Notebook

From city streets to hoofbeats

I was quite shocked when I arrived at Cal Poly for the first time. No, it wasn't a psycho roommate, the size of the campus or the fact that I wasn't living with mom and dad anymore. It was simply the concept and my eventual realization that Cal Poly was an "ag" school.

Now, as a naive freshman sent here straight from suburbia, I have to admit that I was particularly close-minded in this area. In my first year here, I suffered from what I now refer to as my "anti-aggie attitude." Its characteristics included: inability to stand in the library vicinity when the wind was blowing without feeling lightheaded, distancing myself from anyone wearing Wranglers and cowboy boots and complete denial that places like the swine and sheep units even existed on campus.

I am not really sure where the origins of this attitude evolved. I suppose being raised in an area vacant of any heavy agricultural influence contributed to it. I was basically ignorant of the whole industry because I didn't really have any exposure to it. I had never raised a calf or pig in 4-H, and I had never even heard of FFA (Future Farmers of America) until I came here.

Furthermore, I had difficulty understanding what exactly "aggies" were doing at Cal Poly. I mean, what was there to study for four or five years in agriculture? Heck, I had a vegetable garden when I was 10 years old — just put the seed in the ground, water it, and it grows, simple as that. Oh sure, add a little fertilizers and sprays here and there, but nothing an average person with a slight green thumb and a copy of Sunset magazine couldn't figure out.

By Cass Caulfield

Now before all you ag majors get ready to drown me in a horse trough, I want to say that my attitude has since changed. And it took a class at Cal Poly to do it. One summer quarter I very reluctantly enrolled in Ag 301, Agriculture in American Life, a major course for journalism majors. Not only was I upset that I even had to take this course, but I was paranoid that I was going to fail it because I feared I would be competing against students who grew up places where milking cows and riding horses were part of the daily routine. However, much to my surprise (and relief) the class was mostly made up of fellow "agricultural illiterates." In the process of memorizing the different types of dairy cows and cuts of beef, I found that the class was really interesting. It was as if I had discovered a whole new world, learning what happens before the food gets placed on the shelf at the supermarket.

I was amazed at the technological advances made in the agriculture industry as well, and Cal Poly's involvement in the challenge to develop a better product for the consumer. I have gained complete respect for the agriculture department here and all those involved in it. I guess I can thank Cal Poly for opening my eyes and making me realize that California is an agricultural state. And just because no one was a farmer or rancher where I grew up, doesn't mean they don't exist.

Since my "agricultural awakening" I have ventured out to the sheep and horse units on campus without any symptoms of asphyxiation, and I attended my first rodeo this past Poly Royal. So although I by no means consider myself an ag expert, I'd say I've come a long way.

Letters to the Editor

Sow pen is safe

Editor — In response to the letter "Piglet deaths are result of neglect" (May 2), I would like to clarify some of the statements that have led to misconceptions by the general public.

The farrowing barn is the swine "maternity ward," and sows are placed in special pens designed to protect the piglets from being lain on by their mothers. It is common to have piglets stillborn, yet it is uncommon for a sow to stand during farrowing unless they are disturbed. It is unfortunate that

Ms. McGrew and others saw fit to enter this area without permission since they or some other well-meaning but uninformed person may have startled the sow and may well have led to the problem she encountered.

The student staff and faculty involved at the unit were on the lawn near the farrowing barn working with the Poly Royal swine showmanship contest and were able to check the sows on a regular basis. It is regrettable when piglets are killed, but it must be kept in mind that the pens reduce piglet mortality significantly. We practice the most modern husbandry possible within our facilities.

We invite anyone that is interested in swine management to come up. We will be happy to either show you around or give you a list of classes that would better educate you in swine production.

Atlantis returns in 'excellent' condition

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. (AP) — The space shuttle Atlantis returned from orbit in excellent shape, with only about 100 nicks in its thermal tiles and scuffed tires from a crosswind landing, a NASA official said Tuesday.

Gusty winds up to 25 mph blew sand across Rogers Dry Lake as technicians worked on Atlantis a day after landing. But work was on or ahead of schedule and the shuttle was expected to be flown back to Florida on Saturday.

"The spaceship looks really good," said Atlantis Flow Director Conrad Nagel, who is in overall charge of processing the shuttle.

Only 12 of the shuttle's protective thermal tiles were likely to need replacement, Nagel said.

In comparison, after Atlantis' previous mission in December 1988, there were 1,000 nicks and 162 tiles needed to be replaced.

"We feel like we're in very, very good shape," Nagel said.

One window was found to have a nick measuring .08 inch in diameter. It was being studied to determine if it could be polished out or would require more extensive repair.

Atlantis blasted off Thursday from Kennedy Space Center in Florida and delivered the Magellan probe into orbit. The probe was then fired onto an 800 million-mile trajectory to Venus.

Cessna 152 out whenever he wanted. According to the company's records, the plane was fueled at 8:01 Friday night.

Laughlin was born and grew up in La Jolla, Calif. He came to Cal Poly in spring 1984.

"He's one of those guys that's just a good guy," Leonard said. "He liked everybody."

Leonard said a memorial service for Laughlin is scheduled for 1:30 this Saturday afternoon at Presbyterian Church of San Luis Obispo; a wake will follow.

Laughlin and Arbuckle, who had been taking flying lessons since early February, flew together frequently, Leonard said.

Joel Kimmelshue, Alpha Gamma Rho president, said Arbuckle joined the fraternity about two years ago.

"He was real active in the fraternity, he gave a lot of character to the frat," Kimmelshue said.

Arbuckle grew up in Courtland, Calif., near Sacramento. He came to San Luis Obispo four years ago.

Kimmelshue said Arbuckle enjoyed hunting, skeet shooting and skydiving.

"He was a happy-go-lucky guy, pretty much on top of things all the time."

A memorial service was held for Arbuckle Sunday night at Sutcliffe Lawn Memorial Mortuary. About 150 to 200 people attended.

Hooper said, "So many people showed up, so many people. There's just so many people who loved both those guys."

A memorial service will also be held Thursday in Walnut Grove, Calif., where his parents live.

Kimmelshue said Arbuckle's parents are considering setting up a trust fund in John's name to provide scholarships to future Alpha Gamma Rho members.

Hooper said he, his roommates and some of the members of the two fraternities have talked about establishing a memorial on campus.

"After the services are over, our ultimate goal is to put up a plaque and plant a tree at the ag circle."

Arbuckle's older brother, Joe, said, "They were two young men that enjoyed life, beyond the fullest. They're friends for eternity now."

Hooper said, "They were really tight friends, really close friends. In a way it's nice they're with each other, but it's a terrible tragedy for all of us who knew them."

Diablo: Too close a neighbor?

It rests in SLO's backyard; should we ask, 'Is it safe?'

BY JEFF BRUNINGS

DESPITE ITS elusiveness it exists. Resting along the rugged shoreline southwest of San Luis Obispo, is the Diablo Canyon Nuclear Power Plant. Hidden within its massive cement monoliths, electricity is being generated to supply the needs of 2 million people. Yet, surrounding the nuclear industry is overt public concern assailing both private operators and its Herculean big-brother, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC).

On the platforms of protest, critics doubt the industries regard for safety and its effectual regulation.

On Thursday, March 27, a handful of protesters pushed their way through the crowded downtown streets of Farmer's Market. Some gripped banners in their hands protesting the use of nuclear energy while others held small white candles with flickering flames in silent acknowledgment.

The demonstration marked the third anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear accident.

"We want to remind people to stop and take a few moments and think about the consequences of nuclear technology," said William Miller, an Abalone Alliance member whose organization brought the demonstration together. "There are a lot of issues still alive with Diablo Canyon. We want to be spark plugs for the community, have the community be aware what is going on and bring pressure to bare."

Since the serious accidents at Three Mile Island in 1979 and the Chernobyl Nuclear Power Station in the Soviet Union in 1986, the safety and environmental track record of the industry has been tarnished.

"PG&E was forced time and time again to upgrade their safety procedures at the plant and upgrade evacuation plans," said Abalone Alliance affiliate Jeff Olson. "With this tremendous technology is also a tremendous danger and a lot of people keep believing the technology will outrun the danger. I think it will be a miracle if Diablo Canyon ever shuts down without a major release of radiation."

Buried in the back pages of newspapers are isolated incidences of negligent management, safety procedures being broken and employees sleeping on the job. And while the NRC has imposed fines on such violators, sometimes halting operations of the facilities until remedied, critics claim the NRC has failed in its immense responsibility of monitoring the nuclear industry.

"The NRC could better be called the nuclear advocacy committee," said Richard Krantzdorf, a political science professor at Cal Poly. "I don't think anyone believes the NRC listens to the public. They are there to further the interest of the nuclear industry." Many of the people employed by the agency were at one time likely to have been working within the industry, he said.

Jon Kopeck, a spokesman for the public affairs division of the NRC in Washington, D.C. reciprocated the criticism.

"We get it from all sides," Kopeck said. "The utilities say from time to time we are too tough with our standards and our regulations (while) the critics say we are too easy on the industry. The best way of responding to that type of criticism is there hasn't been any deaths or injuries of the public or workers involved in operating nuclear power plants."

Ignited by last week's episode regarding a Texas nuclear plant, the NRC has been awakened by the concern of buy-out shams within the industry. Senate investigators discovered at least two agreements involving workers who received payments for dropping allegations of safety hazards and failing to report them to the NRC.

"We have put out letters to all the utilities notifying this won't be tolerated by the NRC," Kopeck said. "We are asking the utilities to review their agreements, if they have any, and get back to us."

The NRC has set July 31 as a deadline to receive any agreements that may exist to silence safety allegations by employees. "It's our job to make sure the public health and safety is protected. We are the regulators, it's that simple," he said.

Clearly a goal of the nuclear power industry is to protect plant personnel, the public and the environment from the hazards of radiation. Therefore, compliance to establish safety standards is a worthy investment. But there is another side — that of profitability.

The rate scale, a measurement to determine expected revenues of a utility company, is based on electrical output of the plant. This was seen in PG&E's recent 5 percent increase; when the plant performs, the rate scale goes up and the plant gets more money.

"We feel that (PG&E) will try to make the plant perform even though they may have some safety concerns because the amount they get for the plant is tied right into how many hours it runs," Miller said.

PG&E spokesman George Sarkisran justified the rate hikes as necessary to cover current and projected operating costs. The premise of thwarting safety measures to increase electrical output is a political activation, he said.

"Safety is the paramount concern," Sarkisran said. "If the plant runs well you automatically generate electricity."

Consumer groups have been involved in proposals regarding Diablo Canyon and they believe the rate scale to be in the best interest of all the customers, he said.

Diablo Canyon has been producing electricity since operation began in the Unit 1 reactor in April, 1985 and increased capacity with the Unit 2 reactor starting in March 1986. The plant generates 2.2 million kilowatts of electricity, serving nearly 20 percent of PG&E's total needs to meet the demands of Northern and Central California.

But the original chartering of the plant, encompassing nearly 500 federal, state and local licenses, met fierce opposition through heated protest spurred by the Abalone Alliance.

In 1981, thousands of protesters tried to prevent construction workers and PG&E employees from entering the plant gates near Port San Luis. New recruits were constantly being trained by the Abalone Alliance in an obligatory six-hour non-violence training seminar.

A record of 1,493 people were arrested by local and neighboring county police. The National Guard was called out to help disperse the protest.

"We are one of the few groups locally that condones non-violent civil disobedience. It is one of the differences between us and other groups," Miller said. The Abalone Alliance is now concentrating on public education campaigns.

Less than one week after the demonstrations at Diablo Canyon in 1981, a constructional error was found within a safety system that heightened the public's concern for safety at the plant.

During engineering checks of safety reinforcements, the cooling pipes within the containment structure of the Unit 2 reactor when compared to a diagram were mirror images of those used on the Unit 1 reactor. The straps used to hold the cooling pipes stable in case of a severe earthquake were located in the wrong areas.

The discovery led the NRC to determine the safety system inoperable and halted further testing of the plant and the loading of fuel in the reactor.

"There are major screw-ups. PG&E is not capable of doing a construction project like that — let alone run a plant," Miller said. "You get a major earthquake, you get a major nuclear accident. That is our formula."

— William Miller, Abalone Alliance

While the March 27 protest was comparatively less impactful than those of 1981, it aroused both community support and spectator dissent.

As the demonstration moved slowly through the active streets, a group of students huddled on a street corner in front of a liquor store. As the protesters passed they scoffed them with comments of biting opinion, "It's the '80s going into the '90s, this is all over with." A protestor turned towards them and replied, "Chernobyl's not!"

kept the business they had, but decided not to accept any new policies. "For a while we had only one company that would accept any new business at all," she said.

Now, with the Supreme Court's decision, that final company has also decided not to take any new business.

"We no longer have any companies who will take a new person, walking off the street, who wants insurance," Coon said.

She predicts that, in light of the decision, it may be temporarily difficult for uninsured people to obtain new policies, particularly for automobiles and motorcycles.

"If anything, it's affecting the people who don't have insurance or who let their insurance lapse," she said. "It is going to be hard for them to find insurance and at a reasonable rate."

However, she added, the decision by many companies to discontinue business is only "a temporary moratorium until they get the law straightened out and the rates changed." She expects to recover lost business once all the provisions of the initiative are completely worked out.

HEY, COLLEGE GRADUATES- HERE'S $400 TO HELP YOU HIT THE ROAD!

The road to success will probably involve some driving. And if you're graduating in the next four months, or if you graduated within the past 12 months, Chrysler Motors can help get you into a brand new car, with a $400 cash allowance.

Apply this cash to any current incentive program on any eligible Jeep or Eagle vehicle.* Just come on in with a copy of your diploma, or a Registrar's letter attesting to your graduation, and get great deals like these:

JEEP WRANGLER - As Low As $9030.
($9430 MSRP, excluding title, taxes & options...less your $400 cash allowance = $9030!)

JEEP COMANCHE 4WD PIONEER - Save Up To $2350.
(Option Discount Package = $1200)

*Excludes Comanche 2WD shortbed.
Cash from Chrysler Corp. can be applied to purchase.
